For most, science is about discoveries by PhDs in lab coats. But do we ever think or imagine that to get to where we are today, science sometimes has taken very quirky directions? This is a series that explores just exactly where science went awry and led to new discoveries and inventions. For example, how did trying to find a cure for malaria lead to air conditioning? What did the development of radar have to do with the microwave oven? Or what does surviving a nuclear war have to do with the Internet? Hosted by Grub Smith and supported by re-enactments; DIY moments with 'silly' scientists; 3D and 2D animations, the series uses three mechanisms to bring the information forth: Show and Tell, Test and Discover, and See and Relate. Each episode shows the viewers that even though some past moments in science may seem crazy to us today - they made perfect sense at the time – and vice versa! It also shows how these moments led to either a breakthrough in understanding or a new product, which ultimately turned out to be something we enjoy and perhaps take for granted today.

Every day, animals face the same problems – how to find food, water and shelter, how to defend themselves from enemies – in short, how to survive. The problems are universal, but the solutions are endlessly varied. In the amazing world of animals it seems that there are no such things as insurmountable challenges. Nature, in its infinite variety, has answers to them all. Did you know that whales are the only marine animals which hunt on land? Or that there are lizards that can run on water?
